CORN PRODUCTION IN MICHIGAN, 1928-1939

By Counties

The area devoted to corn in Michigan normally comprises about 20 percent of total field crop acreage. Nearly all of the crop is consumed on the farms where grown and the small percentage sold is utilized within the State. In addition, considerable quantities are shipped into the State in most years. Corn prices average higher than in surplus producing States by an amount at least equal to transportation and handling costs. Although yields are lower on the average, the value of production per acre is often greater than in the leading corn States, and corn is considered a profitable crop for the farmers of southern and western Michigan.

While yields are generally highest in the extreme southern counties, good yields are also obtained in many other counties. The area best adapted for corn growing embraces Crop-Reporting Districts 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, and the counties bordering on Lake Michigan in District 2; approximately 94 percent of the State's corn acreage is located within this area. The average length of growing season, as measured by the interval between the average date of last killing frost in spring and the first in autumn, is 163 days for this area as a whole.

The acreage of corn in Michigan has remained relatively stable during the past 40 years, much of the time it having been between 1,500,000 and 1,600,000 acres. Fluctuations have been associated chiefly with changes in livestock population. The acreage exceeded 1,700,000 acres in most of the years from 1914 to 1922, which was followed by a downward trend that reached its low point of 1,197,000 acres in 1929. A sharp increase to 1,512,000 acres occurred in 1931 and since then the acreage has remained around the normal level.

During the 12-year period for which county estimates are shown in this report, yields were 5 bushels or more above the 12-year average in 1932, 1935, 1937, 1938, and 1939. The other years of the period were generally deficient in moisture during the critical months of growth; yields were considerably below average in the unusually dry seasons of 1929, 1930, 1934, and 1936. The use of hybrid seed corn began at a later date than in some of the other States. From the best information available, approximately 10 percent of the State's acreage was planted with hybrid seed in 1939 and 18 percent in 1940. While this development has not as yet importantly affected the average yield on total acreage, it has resulted in a higher average for the group of farms using that type of seed. With the further development of seed adapted to climatic conditions in Michigan, its use is expected to become rather general, in which event a relative increase in average corn yields may be expected.

Between 75 and 80 percent of the total acreage is husked for grain. The percentage used for silage varies from about 13 to 18 percent, depending more or less upon the yield of silage in different years. The remainder is cut for forage, hogged down, and pastured. The estimated total production of corn as shown in this report is intended to represent the equivalent quantity of corn produced on the total acreage regardless of the method of utilization. This average equivalent yield usually ranges from 1.0 to 2.0 bushels below that obtained from the acreage harvested for grain, as the potential yield on silage and forage acreage is several bushels less than the yield on acres of normally matured grain.

With no annual farm census in Michigan, such as is available in many other important agricultural States, considerable difficulty is encountered in preparing satisfactory county estimates. The data herein are based upon available information from the United States Census taken every fifth year, reports obtained through sample surveys by the Michigan Co-operative Crop Reporting Service from its crop correspondents, and, in very recent years, compilations of data made by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

The Agricultural Marketing Service has supplied much basic data for the administration of the various Federal crop adjustment programs, and a considerable portion of such information involved the preparation of county estimates. A growing need for county statistics is evidenced by the increasing number of requests being received. Now that a 12-year series is available for corn, it is believed that the publication of the data will serve many useful purposes and that State and Federal officials, extension workers, educational institutions, and the general public will find this compilation useful for study and future reference.
